Christine is about so much more than a car tht that kills people. It is about loyalty, being a teenager, being in love, being hated, growing up, and coming out of ones shell. King has a way of using character development, metaphors, analogies, and imagery that get you through even the slower parts of his books, and this one is no exception.

I have a real guilty-pleasure, love/love realtionship with Stephen King books. I don't care how literarily unhip that is. Christine was the first big-girl book I ever read--I was in the fourth grade and we'd just moved to California. I didn't have any friends or anywhere to go yet, so I spent my days poking around in the library, like any good nerd.

For my money Christine is Stephen King's best work. A ast-paced, believable and terrifying tale of "everyday evil" that like Pet Sematary brings the thing in the closet back from your childhood memories to just outside your "grownup" bedroom door. It IS still OUTSIDE that door.
