This influence, which arose from prestige and substantial wealth, combined with the strength which the federal Bank derived from the federal accounts to constitute what may tritely be called a "money power." But it was a disciplined, conservative money power and just what the economy needed. But it was no longer the money power. It was rivaled, as Philadelphia was by New York, by the newer, more vigorous, more aggressive, and more democratic part of the business world.

I think money itself is not power but it has power and gives you THE POWER. Like, say, food itself is not energy, it gives you energy when processed inside the body. Money exchanges the power of possession. It allows you to possess anything (materialistic, basically) for its value. So a human tends to get attracted and desires to own whatever he sees.
